THE CENSUS

The numbering of the people by Moses is mentioned in the Old Testament, and a form of Census is said to have existed in Babylon, Egypt and China some thousands of years before Christ. Among the Romans the Census was a highly developed instrument for the administration of the Empire.

Census-taking appears to have fallen into disuse, except in China, from the time of the Romans until the 17th and 18th Centuries, when the honour of introducing the first modern Census appears to have been shared between Old and New Worlds. Thereafter the Census spread rapidly through many countries.

In 1801 the first Census of England, Wales and Scotland was held, and during the same century most of the important countries throughout the world, including the whole British Empire, took Censuses.

The first Census in Australia, disregarding the early "musters", was held in 1828 (in New South Wales); from this developed a regular series for all States, with a uniform Census year, at decennial intervals from 1881 onwards. The first Census conducted under Commonwealth authority was taken in 1911.

During the decade around 1950 there were Censuses in more than 150 countries (including Australia) with an estimated population of about 2,000 million persons, or 80 per cent. of the world's peoples.

The uses of the modern Census are far removed from those of Roman and earlier times, which were mainly military or fiscal. Demographer, economist, administrator, business man, researcher—all derive information for their purposes from the modern Census which it alone can supply.

The Census furnishes basic information for studies in population movements, social welfare, fertility, age projections and life expectation, for problems in the fields of employment, industry, the absorption of migrants and the development of new areas, for town planning and housing surveys, and for market research and sampling techniques.

The broad outlines of the characteristics of the population of Australia recorded at the Census of 1954 are depicted in this booklet. For detail the reader is referred to the Census publications issued by the Commonwealth Bureau of Census and Statistics (see last page) or is invited to apply to the Commonwealth Statistician, Canberra, for advice on specific subjects or problems.

Acting Commonwealth Statistician.
